President's Salvo

None of the Chapter positions are difficult, although President does require handling the meetings. Please step forward and take a Chapter job and keep the St. Lucie River Chapter growing and prosperous.

One may ask, "What are you going to do?" I personally will be taking over as State Secretary for the Florida Society moving up from Treasurer. I still intend to handle Eagle Scouts, Florida Good Citizenship, and will take an appointed position such as Chaplain, but with the State Secretaries job, I will not have time to run a Chapter. So please step up and volunteer, even if you are a new member or an old member. There is no requirement for skill level, just a desire to do the job. Just send me an e-mail at allriedi42@bellsouth.net or give me a call at 772-336-0926.

Thank you all for what you do for us.

Hall Riediger, President

Brigadier General Daniel Morgan

Daniel Morgan was born July 6, 1736 in Hunterdon County, New Jersey. His grandparents were Welsh immigrants. At the age of 17, Morgan left home and moved to the Shenandoah Valley, settling on the frontier near present Winchester, Virginia. He worked as a teamster, at a sawmill, and cleared land.

Morgan served as a civilian teamster during the French and Indian War. Returning from the advance on Fort Duquesne by General Braddock, Morgan was punished with 499 lashes for striking a superior officer, a punishment which could be fatal. Thereafter, Morgan developed a hatred for the British Army.

On the outbreak of the Battles of Lexington and Concord, the Continental Congress required the formation of 10 rifle companies from the middle colonies to support the siege of Boston. Morgan was chosen by the Virginia House of Burgesses to form one of these and command with the rank of Captain. His men were assembled July 14, 1775 at Winchester whereupon they marched 600 miles in 21 days to Boston. Morgan's men benefitted from the technology of their rifles, which allowed them to be more accurate than muskets. Morgan developed tactics that used this to his advantage; tactics that at the time were viewed as dishonorable by the British elite. Morgan would use his rifles at longer range to kill the British Indian guides and then would take aim at the British officers themselves, causing confusion within the enemy lines.

Captain Morgan was chosen to command three rifle companies under the direction of Colonel Benedict Arnold in the Invasion of Canada. The Arnold Expedition into Canada lost 400 men on the advance, arriving on November 9, 1775 with some 600 men. Brigadier General Richard Montgomery arrived, forces were joined, and the Battle of Quebec was begun on December 31. Attacking forces were divided between Montgomery and Arnold, allowing two thrusts. Colonel Arnold was wounded in the leg and General Montgomery was killed. The attack faltered and Morgan and men were encircled and surrendered. Morgan was a prisoner of war until January 1777.

Returning to the Army, Morgan learned he had been promoted to Colonel for his efforts at Quebec and given orders to raise and command the 11th Virginia Regiment. He was also placed in command of the Provisional Rifle Corps, a light infantry unit selected from units of the main army.

Morgan's regiment was assigned to the Northern Department under General Horatio Gates. Morgan was present at Freeman's Farm and at the Battle of Bemis Heights, where under orders of Benedict Arnold, his sharpshooters mortally wounded General Simon Fraser.

When the Virginia Line was reorganized on September 14, 1778, Morgan became Colonel of the 7th Virginia Regiment. Morgan had become dissatisfied with the Army and Congress, being repeatedly passed over for promotion, and on June 30, 1779 he was allowed to resign.

In June 1780, Gates urged Morgan to re-enter service, but Morgan declined.

After Gates' disaster at the Battle of Camden, Morgan joined the Southern Command at Hillsborough, North Carolina. On October 13, 1780 he finally received promotion to Brigadier General. Morgan received orders from Nathaniel Greene to forage the back-country of South Carolina and harass the enemy while avoiding direct battle.

When the strategy became apparent to the British, Cornwallis sent Colonel Banastre Tarleton to hunt Morgan down. Against orders, Morgan decided to set up a direct confrontation.

On January 17, 1781, the two forces met at the Battle of Cowpens. Morgan's command was supplemented by militia and dragoons, while Tarleton's men were re-enforced with regular light infantry. Morgan used Tarleton's aggressive nature and disdain for militia against him. Morgan's marksmen and militia were placed in front and ordered to engage, inflict damage, and withdraw as soon as they were threatened, thereby presumably inviting a premature assault on the center of the American lines. Tarleton ordered charge. While retreating, Morgan's men were to reload, and on signal, stop and fire point blank on the pursuers. What was presumed to be fleeing militia was actually the beginning of a double envelopment or pincer movement by Morgan's men which resulted in Tarleton's 1076 men suffering 110 killed and 830 captured in less than an hour. Tarleton escaped, but Cornwallis lost his legion and his light infantry for the remainder of the campaign.

On February 10, due to his painful sciatica, Morgan returned to his Virginia farm. He served only briefly the remainder of the war.

In 1790 Congress awarded Daniel Morgan a gold medal to commemorate his victory at Cowpens. In 1794, Morgan was called to service under "Light Horse Harry" Lee to suppress the Whiskey Rebellion. Morgan served in the United States House of Representatives from 1797 to 1799.

Daniel Morgan died July 6, 1802 at Winchester, Virginia on his 66th birthday.
