Major General Benjamin Lincoln

Benjamin Lincoln was born January 24 1733 in Hingham, Massachusetts, the son of wealthy Suffolk County parents. Lincoln received an education and followed his father into public life, becoming town constable at age 21. He joined the Suffolk County militia and was elected town clerk of Hingham. Lincoln became a patriotic voice for the local citizens and was elected as a representative to the provincial assembly and promoted to Lieutenant Colonel in the militia.

The provincial assembly was dissolved and reformed to become the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, the government for the entire colony with the exception of British held Boston, and Lincoln rose in prominence. In January 1776, Lincoln was promoted Major General of the Massachusetts militia, attending to the colonies coastal defenses. Lincoln lobbied for a commission in the Continental Army. He was placed in command of a brigade of state militia requested to join Washington's army at New York. Lincoln took part in Washington's northward retreat. He was present at the Battle of White Plains. Upon the expiration of his troops' enlistments, Lincoln returned to Massachusetts to take command of new recruits. Congress commissioned Lincoln a Major General on February 14, 1777.

Commanding at Bound Brook, New Jersey, Lincoln barely escaped capture as his force, badly outnumbered and nearly surrounded, was defeated by Lieutenant General Lord Charles Cornwallis at the Battle of Bound Brook. Lincoln managed a retreat with most of his command.

In July, Lincoln was sent to General Philip Schuyler to defend upstate New York against an advance by General John Burgoyne from Quebec. Lincoln coordinated the New England militia, including those under General John Stark, who refused to place his forces under Lincoln's command, having resigned his continental commission over a perceived promotional slight. Stark won a victory at the Battle of Bennington operating independently. Schuyler was replaced by General Horatio Gates, who ordered Lincoln's force to join him as Gates' army fought the Battles of Saratoga. Gates dismissed General Benedict Arnold after the Battle of Freeman's Farm and Lincoln was placed in command of the army's right. At the Battle of Bemis Heights, Lincoln was in command of defenses as other elements advanced on the British. The following day, Lincoln led a force to fortify the ford at Fort Edward, and while encountering a British company, Lincoln's ankle was shattered by a musket ball. Lincoln learned of Burgoyne's surrender while receiving treatment at Albany.

Lincoln was appointed commander of the Southern Department in September 1778. In October 1779, Lincoln partnered with French ships and troops under Vice Admiral Comte d'Estaing to lay siege to Savannah, Georgia. American forces attacked, but were unable to break British defenses. The siege failed as d'Estaing departed rather than risk his ships during the hurricane season. Lincoln removed his command to Charleston, South Carolina. The city of Charleston came under attack in March 1780 by British forces from New York under Lieutenant General Sir Henry Clinton. With Charleston under siege, Lincoln attempted to negotiate the evacuation of the city, and later attempted to negotiate a surrender. On May 12, 1780, Lincoln was forced to unconditionally surrender, being denied the traditional honors of war by Clinton. Surrendering over 5000 men, the loss was one of the worst Continental defeats of the war.

Lincoln was paroled and awaited exchange. Requesting a court of inquiry, none was formed and no charges were brought against him. In November 1780, he was exchanged for British Major General William Phillips and Baron Friedrich von Riedesel. Lincoln spent the winter recruiting troops in New England before joining Washington's army outside New York.

In August 1781, Lincoln moved south as Washington attempted to trap Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia. Lincoln commanded the 2nd Division of the army at the Battle of Yorktown. As the British were forced to surrender, Washington, in a meeting with Cornwallis, demanded the same harsh conditions that the British had required of Lincoln at Charleston. On October 19, 1781, the British formally surrendered. Cornwallis did not attend the ceremony, sending his second in command, General Charles O'Hara. O'Hara first attempted to surrender to French Lieutenant General Comte de Rochambeau, but was directed to the Americans. Washington refused to receive the sword of O'Hara, directing it to be presented to General Lincoln instead, now his second in command.

In October, 1781, Benjamin Lincoln was appointed the first Secretary of War by Congress.

In 1787, Lincoln was elected Lieutenant Governor of Massachusetts.

Benjamin Lincoln died at Hingham, Massachusetts on May 9, 1810
